

Dear Editor,

Connecticut should join the Transportation and Climate Initiative program in order to fund critical investments in our communities to improve infrastructure and public health. [If you are responding to a specific article, refer to it here.]

TCI-P would improve the health of Connecticut's residents, and prevent deaths and breathing related problems due to air pollution. Additionally, TCI-P would invest in the development of infrastructure in our communities, so that residents would have better access to public transportation and the internet.

Connecticut's largest source of greenhouse gas emissions comes from our transportation sector. Our state needs to encourage residents to use electric and low emission forms of transportation, such as electric vehicles, public transportation, and bikes. TCI-P would provide residents with incentives to adopt these forms of transportation.

TCI-P would provide CT with an opportunity to improve its infrastructure system, so that it can adapt to climate change. Local governments do not have the resources to finance these necessary infrastructure projects.

I strongly encourage the Connecticut General Assembly to vote to join the Transportation and Climate Initiative Program. We need these investments to make Connecticut a healthier place to live.

Sincerely,
